Read through the draft once. Answer the following questions. Once you have finished answering the questions, take turns reading your essays out loud.

1. Is there a clear introduction to the essay that outlines the new ways of seeing discussed in the essay? If so, can you identify the main thesis/point in the introduction (write it down)? If not, what can the author do to make their main point more clear?
2. What, specifically, interested you about the draft?
3. Identify at least one place where you think the your peer could take an idea or point a bit further. Is there another example of how we see now that they could include, furthering their current argument? Is there a place where they could build on Berger a bit more in order to show how things have changed since the 70s? What else in their argument do you want to know more about? Be specific.
4. Do all of the paragraphs build on each other? Would it make sense to reorder some of the points? Are there clear transitions from one idea to the next, or could they use some revision?
5. What do you suggest as the single most important revision your peer could make?
